

History was made this morning

...and yesterday. And the day before.
And tomorrow it will happen again.

History is the day-by-day story of people.
What they do. How they feel. And why.

The New York Times helps you keep up with history as it's being made.

Helps you understand what people are doing to change your world.

People. Wherever people make things happen, New York Times people are on the scene.
People like these...

Thomas A. Johnson, who went to Vietnam for a special series on Negro servicemen there.

James Wooten, reporting from the South on the process of school desegregation.

Grace Glueck, on the arts scene, to help you understand the increasing importance of black artists.

Earl Caldwell, reporting on book stores featuring materials on black history.

Clive Barnes, covering in detail the burgeoning black theater, its actors, playwrights and audiences.

Nancy Hicks, who gave Times readers an inside look at the school controversy at Oceanhill-Brownsville.

John Kifner, reporting on the killing of Black Panther leaders in Chicago.

Francis X. Clines, with a probing report on the impact of welfare cutbacks.

Charlayne Hunter, one of the first black students at the University of Georgia, who returned to report on the changes there.

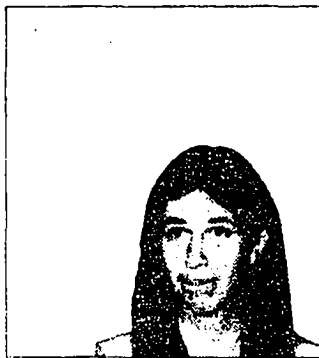

Lesley Oelsner, who went to an all-black New Jersey town to report on the impact of black power.

Damon Stetson, surveying the growing power of black workers in labor unions.

Edward B. Fiske, reporting on the influence of black power on the nation's churches.

Linda Greenhouse, writing about black fashion designers helped by Wall Street advisors.

Paul Delaney, covering the effects of inflation and inferior consumer products on the black community.

Barbara Campbell, who studied the Schomburg Collection of black history resource materials for a special Times report.

People. The New York Times has more than 500 editors and reporters in the United States to let you know what people are doing to make history today.

History. It happens every day. Keep up with everything that happens. Every day in
